Januarie 2025

Uitgawe
Nr.76

Dear SABGBA Members,

It's already February, but I would like to once again wish each one of you a prosperous 2025. According to agricultural experts, the outlook for South African agriculture this year appears promising, with the possibility of a recovery period after recent challenges.

Global weather forecasters, including the International Research Institute for Climate and Society (IRI), predict the likelihood of a La Niña weather pattern until April. This phenomenon typically brings above-average rainfall to South Africa and the broader Southern Africa region. I know that some areas are still experiencing severe drought, and I sincerely hope that this weather pattern will also benefit you.

In recent discussions with farmers, Johan Kotzé, CEO of AgriSA, noted one clear message: farmers remain committed to farming. Despite political uncertainty, they will continue to produce food, support rural economies, and drive agricultural growth. This is exactly how I know our farmers—persistent and unwavering, even in the face of tough conditions.

My hope for this year is that we can come up with creative solutions to make our goat farming operations even more efficient. We must always strive for a thriving industry that benefits everyone and generates income. Because if our farmers aren't making money, then nothing else can function properly!

I'm no scientist or someone with great authority, but I truly believe that 2025 holds bright prospects for our livestock and plenty of smiles for us all!

Enjoy the first Window of the year, and happy farming!

Kind regards,
Michelle

First-of-its-Kind Preparation Course - Barend Koen
The Eastern Cape Boer Goat Club, with approval from SABGBA, successfully hosted its first preparation course on November 23, 2024!

Some members of the Eastern Cape Boer Goat Club expressed the need to learn how to properly prepare a goat for an auction or show—saying, "Because I can never get mine to look like that!"

This one-day course consisted of three sections: grooming, feeding, and photography. All three elements must be executed properly for an animal to take one's breath away. Remove just one, and you're out of the spotlight.

Pw Botha assembled a team of experts to guide the day's activities. He also shared his own knowledge and answered questions from the group. Hennie le Roux (Witsand BBS) demonstrated his skills with the shears, and everyone got hands-on experience by preparing two or three goats themselves to apply their new knowledge.

Michelle Kruger taught attendees photography skills, ensuring they could capture high-quality images of their goats for marketing purposes. Oom Leon Meiring from 333 Feeds (Cradock) showcased his feed products and provided valuable advice on proper animal nutrition.

The course was hosted at BSK BBS outside Paterson, where attendees enjoyed excellent accommodation and delicious meals. The social aspect and relationship-building also contributed to improvements in overall herd management.

Each participant received a breed standard booklet, emphasizing the importance of breeding goats to meet the standard rather than manipulating them artificially. The course's sole purpose was to enhance the natural qualities of the animals.

Following the course, the impact was immediately visible, as breeders had already started applying their newfound knowledge in their marketing efforts.

PREPARATION OF BOER GOATS FOR SHOWS - By: Lukas Burger

Many people believe that winning a show is simply about having the best feed or the best handler. If that were the case, showing goats would be a “piece of cake.” Unfortunately, it requires much more hard work, dedication, and resilience.

Let's start at the beginning:

1. Know the Show Dates

You must know when the show(s) you are preparing for will take place. This determines when to start feeding the goats.

- This depends on the goats' condition and whether they are accustomed to feedlot conditions.
- Goats that have been shown before can be finished off within three months. Otherwise, it can take up to six months.
- Ewes (four-tooth and older) must be visibly pregnant or nursing at the show. This means you should mate the selected ewes 3-4 months before the event.
- △ Warning: Heavily pregnant ewes are difficult to transport and can become stressed (or “sour”) at the show.
- Rams should be fed in groups of 5-7. Larger groups can hinder growth due to increased sexual activity.
- Bigger rams should be fed separately from the ewes whenever possible. Remember, a ram can lose 10-15 kg during breeding season just from smelling receptive ewes!
- Ewes can be kept in larger groups. A good practice is to divide them by age group.

2. Hoof & Claw Trimming

Trim hooves approximately every three weeks, depending on wet or dry conditions. The type of terrain they walk on also plays a role—on hard terrain, trimming will be needed less often.

3. Trimming & Grooming (2-3 days before the show)

What should be trimmed?

- Hair forming a knob in front of the head
- Mane hair on the neck
- Hair on the forelegs, belly, and hind legs (only slightly trimmed)
- Tail hair (optional)
- Brush out fluffy undercoat hair

4. Horn Smoothing

- Sharp ridges on the horns can be filed or sanded down.
- Horns can also be polished smooth.

5. Planning the Show Team

- You should already have selected the best goats for feeding and preparation.
- Now, weigh the goats and pick the best ones in each weight or tooth class (e.g., 4T, 6T, or age categories used internationally).

6. Washing the Goats (One day before the show)

- Wash the show goats using regular dish soap to get them bright white and clean.
- Pro Tip: Before washing and transporting, inject each goat with a recommended dose of antibiotics. This helps prevent pneumonia, Pasteurella, and reduces stress-related illnesses—saving you from costly losses and heartache.

7. Arriving at the Show

Expect some nerves—you'll be wondering: Are my goats good enough? Fat enough? Big enough?

Relax—it's normal!

- Unload the goats and place them in pens exactly as they were grouped at home—they recognize each other.
- Do not overcrowd the pens—goats must stay there for 2-4 days.
- Feed them the exact same diet as at home.
- Apply oil (even regular motor oil) on their horns and red areas for extra shine.

8. Show Judging Begins

- Make sure you enter each goat in the correct weight or age group.
- When presenting your goat to the judge, stand confidently and be proud—this is the best you have!
- NEVER drag a goat—this can damage its pastern joints.
- At this point, there's nothing more you can do. Take your prize and walk out with pride! (Just joking!)

After the Show

I hope you learned something from the judging process. If not, forget this show and move on to the next one!

If your goats have correct conformation, growth potential, size, and strong legs, they will stand out with good conditioning and win prizes. However, if these traits are lacking, no amount of extra feeding will make them a champion overnight.

"Feeding is half the breeding, but never forget the breeding!"

The Eastern Cape Boer Goat Club Field Ram Project was started in 1998 by several members of the Eastern Cape Boer Goat Club with the goal of providing uniform and well-adapted field rams to livestock producers. In 2024, the project yielded many uniform rams and has been managed for the third consecutive year under the supervision of Marlé Slabbert of Osplaat Boer Goat Stud. The 40 Boerbok rams that were inducted on 17 April in the Jansenville area underwent an adjustment phase for two months, followed by a field phase. Veeplaas attended the selection process on 23 October 2024 to learn more about the various stages the rams go through and the role of SA Studbook's involvement in the project.

Ready for Work and Proven

During the adjustment phase, the rams are given the opportunity to adapt to different grazing and climatic conditions. Marlé says their adaptability is tested and monitored during this phase. The adaptability of a ram is crucial, as buyers attending the ram auction want to purchase a ram that will be work-ready and immediately usable without going through an adjustment phase.

After the adjustment phase, the rams undergo a five-month field phase where their growth is tested under natural conditions. They are not supplemented with additional feed and live in the field, where they are checked every two weeks to ensure they are healthy, parasite-free, and injury-free. They are also weighed monthly. During the selection in October, 29 of the 40 rams made it through to the feed phase. This includes a three-month period where the rams are fed to optimize weight gain in preparation for the annual Eastern Cape Boer Goat Club auction (held in January) in Somerset East.

"The rams are given feed to encourage optimal weight gain during this period," explains Marlé. "They receive a certain amount of pellets, lucerne, and vitamin and mineral supplements daily.

Parasite control is also applied. We weigh them monthly to determine how quickly each ram can 'recover' during this phase. This ensures they will be ready for breeding in a new environment."

After the feeding phase, another selection takes place to ensure there are no faults or developmental issues. The rams are then selected as stud or herd rams for the field ram auction. The growth index and statistics from each phase are made available.

The Selection Process

Judge Stephanus Malan states that one must always remember that Boer goats are a meat breed, so emphasis must be placed on meat traits. "As Boer goat judges, we look at the front, middle, and hindquarters, which are evaluated according to the breed standards of other meat breeds. Other important features include color, head shape, mouth and teats, good length, width, and depth, and overall balance when the animal walks. A Boer goat's hooves must be straight; otherwise, it will be disqualified. If a goat is 'splay-footed,' it means its hooves are turned outward. If it has 'cow-hocked' hooves, they are turned inward. From the side, a goat should not have sickle hocks or walk upright on its hooves. It is an extensive breed, so it must have good mobility."

Becoming a judge is not easy. A prospective judge must first complete a junior course and then two senior courses with a passing grade of 70%. Afterward, the person is invited by the South African Boer Goat Breeders Association to do a judging exam, where one must be thoroughly knowledgeable.

If You Measure, You'll Know

Erick Joosten, technical advisor of SA Studbook in the Eastern Cape, explained during the selection process on 23 October 2024 that their role is to collect the rams' phenotypic or measured information. "We monitor the rams' weight gain by weighing them regularly during the field phase.

Based on this, we calculate their average daily gain, or growth rate. We also take the rams' body measurements, including shoulder height, to record how tall the animal is at a specific age. Body length is also important—it is calculated relative to the ram's height and is referred to as the height-length ratio. We measure the chest circumference of each ram to determine if it affects the animal's weight. Measuring chest width and depth helps to determine each ram's frame type."

"Finally, and very importantly, we measure the scrotum circumference across the widest part of a normally developed scrotum, and determine whether both testicles are present and equally developed. Scrotum circumference is the best phenotypic indicator of a ram's reproductive potential."

The rams' scrotums are also measured to determine their physical size at a certain age. Erick says it's important to note that not all the rams are exactly the same age. "We take the younger rams' scrotum size relative to their body size and age into account, and the same applies to the older rams."

All of this information is uploaded to SA Studbook's Logix program, where data on weight gain, growth rate, height-to-length ratio, and scrotum circumference is processed. SA Studbook also works out correction factors, comparing rams with each other and observing how younger and older rams adapt. This information is then processed to a standardized age to compare younger and older rams.

The Value of Selection

All these measurements and data are used to determine the scientific value of selection and to provide a comparable benchmark for evaluating all the rams. The same body measurements from the group are repeated during the feeding phase, just before they go to auction. This is to determine whether they grew better during this phase or not.

An important evaluation aspect is the different production environments and systems the rams were in before the test. Information such as place of birth, birthdate, birth weight (optional), rearing status (single or multiple births from a ewe), and the weighing of an animal at around 100 days of age to determine weaning weight is welcomed. This allows SA Studbook to determine which regions the goats are from and, over time, create a variation component in breeding value models.

Therefore, Boer goat and other small livestock farmers are encouraged not only to register their animals but also to join field ram clubs where animals from different environments are brought together, and evaluations are done to gather scientific information.

The project is supported by MSD Animal Health (annual vaccinations), Virbac (dosing every three weeks), and OVK (feed supply).

For more information, contact Marlé Slabbert at 072 478 8322 or osplaat@gmail.com.

The final group after the selection process. From left to right: Stephanus Malan, judge from Paardefontein Boerbok Stud, PJ van Rensburg from Garmland Farming, Oubaas Slabbert from Osplaat Boerbok Stud, JJ Jansen van Vuuren, OVK branch manager in Jansenville, Johan Mellet, MSD Animal Health's technical sales representative in the Eastern Cape, Marlé Slabbert from Osplaat Boerbok Stud and manager of the field ram project, Louis Nell, judge from Vaatjie and Louis Nell Boerbok Stud, Erick Joosten, technical advisor of SA Studbook/Logix in the Eastern Cape, Richard Biggs from Biggs Boerbok Stud and chairman of the Eastern Cape Boerbok Club, and Dawie and Boet Viljoen, Boer goat farmers from Mon Desiré.

The Northern Cape veld ram project, which has been collaborating with the Prieska veld ram club for the second year, recorded relatively high average prices for breeding animals and registered ewes during their auction on February 6 at Oranjerivier Feeds in Prieska.

The Northern Cape veld ram project was established 40 years ago, and its first auction was held in 1986 in Griekwastad. According to the chairman, Jaco van Rensburg, it was later expanded to Kenhardt and Prieska.

“The goal of the project is to evaluate potential breeding rams under normal veld conditions as accurately as possible and to provide producers with as much information as possible.”

They also believe that animals should be bred phenotypically for reproduction, not based on a certain appearance preferred by breeders. “The importance of an animal’s form has been overstated in the past, and economically important traits such as fertility and growth potential have been overlooked.”

The average price for Boer goat rams was R14,600 (breeding) and R8,750 (commercial flock). The average price for Boer goat ewes was R2,000.

Vleissentraal Port Elizabeth conducted the auction, and Danie Strauss was the auctioneer.
